

as i sit writing this, i am relishing the mouth-watering sweets distributed to the whole office. it is devinderji's birthday, and subodhji is celebrating the birth of his first child! there is a rise in spirits as people take a break, shouting across the floor or peering down the circular cut outs to congratulate both.

mornings are the best time of the day here – if you come a little early, everything is quiet, except the chirping birds in the garden. entering through the mammoth 10m tall door, one feels like entering into the belly of a slumbering giant. however many times i enter, the magnanimity of the atrium hits me each time. i can never get used to the awe of the tall door, the tactile sensuality of the brick and stone surfaces, and the hanging glass meeting rooms – gulping in all this at once is – refreshing – it prepares me for the day ahead.

upstairs, the boss is already in, sitting in his triangle concrete volume filled with light – exuding sheer energy. as i settle down to work, the office fills in, humming of computers, phones ringing, smell of coffee, papers rustling – studio ao becomes a busy place. it makes me smile as i salute the spirit of archohmites, which truly compliments the building – by its dynamism and exuberant attitude towards all things design.
